LU Lucas

Hi Lucas! Are you excited for Halloween?

Hey Sophia! Yeah, I can't wait! How do you celebrate it in Spain?

We usually have costume parties and go trick-or-treating, but it's more common to honor the dead on All Saints' Day. How about in the US?

We do a lot of trick-or-treating, haunted houses, and Halloween parties. My parents told me Halloween used to be more about spooky ghost stories and less about candy.

That's interesting! My grandparents said that in Spain, they used to carve turnips instead of pumpkins. Have you heard of anything like that?

Not really. Here it's always been pumpkins as far as I know. Carving turnips sounds cool but hard! Do you still do any old traditions?

We still light candles for our loved ones on All Saints' Day, but most kids are more into the Halloween costumes and parties now. Do you still tell ghost stories?

Sometimes, but mostly we just watch scary movies. I think ghost stories are making a comeback though. Do you have a favorite Halloween costume?

I love dressing up as characters from my favorite books. This year I'm going as Hermione from Harry Potter. What about you?

Cool! I'm going as a zombie. I think it's fun to do the makeup. Do you decorate your house for Halloween?

A little bit. We put up some spooky lights and fake cobwebs. How about you?

We go all out with decorations, like fake tombstones and skeletons. It's a big event in our neighborhood. Do you get a lot of trick-or-treaters?

Not as many as you probably do. It's getting more popular here, but still not like in the US. Do you have a favorite Halloween candy?

Definitely Reese's Peanut Butter Cups. What's yours?

I love gummies, especially the spooky-shaped ones. How late do you stay out on Halloween?

Usually until 9 or 10. How late do you stay out?

About the same. It's fun to see everyone in their costumes. Have a great Halloween, Lucas!

You too, Sophia! Happy Halloween!

Have a look at how traditions associated with the traditional holiday have changed over the course of several centuries.

Elizabeth, 1750

Greetings, I am Elizabeth, and the year is 1750. In England, we celebrate Halloween with simple but meaningful traditions. We carve faces into turnips and place candles inside to ward off evil spirits. Children go from house to house, reciting verses or singing songs in exchange for soul cakes. It's a night filled with a bit of mischief and a lot of community spirit.

Elizabeth describes Halloween in 1750 England, focusing on turnip lanterns, soul cakes, and communal activities.

William, 1900

Hello, my name is William, and it is the year 1900 in England. Halloween has evolved quite a bit since my grandmother's time. Now, children enjoy dressing up in homemade costumes and playing games like bobbing for apples. We also carve pumpkins instead of turnips, and the night is filled with laughter and fun, rather than fear of spirits.

William describes Halloween in 1900 England, noting the shift to pumpkins, costumes, and playful activities.

Sophie, 2023

Hi, I'm Sophie, and it's the year 2023 here in England. Halloween has become a major celebration with elaborate decorations and themed parties. Children and even adults dress up in a wide range of costumes, from spooky to funny. Trick-or-treating is a huge event, and people go all out with their decor. It's fun to see how this tradition has grown and changed over the centuries.

Haunting Pollution: The Environmental Cost of Halloween

Each year, Halloween enthusiasts eagerly await October 31st to don their spookiest costumes and revel in festive fun. However, behind the vibrant masks and eerie decorations lies a haunting reality: the environmental toll of this beloved holiday. From excessive plastic waste to chemical-laden makeup, Halloween's environmental impact is frighteningly significant.

With Americans spending an estimated $9.1 billion on Halloween merchandise in 2017, the holiday has turned into a massive consumer event. This surge in spending leads to an increase in single-use plastics, from candy wrappers to costume accessories, contributing to landfills and ocean pollution. Additionally, the rise in demand for fast fashion costumes exacerbates the already critical issue of textile waste.

Moreover, the environmental cost extends to Halloween makeup. Many products contain harmful chemicals that can seep into the skin and waterways, posing risks to both human health and aquatic life. As Halloween continues to grow in popularity, it is crucial to address these environmental concerns. Sustainable alternatives, such as homemade costumes and eco-friendly decorations, can help mitigate the negative impact of this festive tradition.

The haunting reality is clear: while Halloween brings joy and excitement, it also leaves behind a trail of environmental damage. By making conscious choices, we can ensure that our celebrations are not only fun but also eco-friendly, allowing future generations to enjoy the magic of Halloween without the ghastly environmental repercussions.

While Halloween is celebrated by many, it has several problematic aspects. Politically, it can perpetuate stereotypes and cultural appropriation through insensitive costumes. Culturally, it often commercializes and trivializes important traditions and beliefs from various cultures. From an environmental perspective, the waste generated by single-use decorations, costumes, and candy wrappers is significant and unsustainable. It's important to rethink how we celebrate Halloween to make it more inclusive and environmentally friendly.

Liam critiques Halloween for its potential to perpetuate stereotypes, cultural appropriation, commercialization of traditions, and environmental unsustainability, emphasizing the need for a more thoughtful approach.
